To assess the diagnostic accuracy of air-mediated percussion for the diagnosis of dementia. This was a single blind prospective diagnostic accuracy study. We studied the diagnostic accuracy of percussion for screening for dementia with images scored using the CERAD-Plus battery, clinical cognitive assessments and complementary investigations. The study was performed in a Neurology clinic, University Hospital of Malmö, Sweden. Consecutive outpatients referred to a Memory Clinic, Department of Neurology, Malmö, Sweden. Study participants: Patients referred to a Memory Clinic for neuropsychological testing and diagnostic clarification. Clinical diagnosis and assessment of cognitive impairment. Result of air-mediated percussion, positive or negative. Air-mediated percussion had a diagnostic accuracy of 61% for the diagnosis of dementia using a cut-off value of two positive results. Air-mediated percussion was not sensitive enough in patients with mild cognitive impairment or confusion, and this may be due to an impaired sensory system. Air-mediated percussion is of limited use in the differential diagnosis of dementia. It is usually positive in patients with rapidly progressing Alzheimer's disease.Stars in Transit Scenic Train Ride Through connections with major railroads, the Mercury Star Line operates several great scenic trains that cover vast distances without ever running out of rural or small town atmosphere.
